In an effort to outperforming competitors, companies must turn their consumers into loyal customers. Meanwhile, companies are facing a decline in the productivity of their brand campaign tools, especially in creating a long-term commitment between customers and the brand/product which can lead to loyalty.

From this point, companies begin to recognize the role of public relations to support their marketing objectives through the use of more credible and effective strategies to enhance brand campaign. One of the many strategies is engaging consumers and customers in a community. Brand community is believed to help foster a bond between the customers, the brand, the product and the company. As to magazine, brand community is also known as readers community.

This research is focused on Femina magazine which also has a form of brand community called Komunitas Femina & Friends. The aim of this research is to measure the effectiveness of Komunitas Femina & Friends in affecting loyalty among its members towards Femina magazine. The relationship of the two variables is investigated by examining how customer's involvement in brand community affects brand loyalty and how the three elements of brand community, such as consciousness of a kind, shared rituals and traditions and moral responsibility partially affect brand loyalty.

This research is carried out using positivist paradigm with quantitative approach. Research is conducted in January-June 2009 period of time while the collection of data took place from April-May 2009. The Population of this research is all community members that count up to 9361 members with a sample of 30 active members. Primary data obtained by mailing questionnaires to virtual forum of the community while data is analyzed by using statistical software SPSS version 16.0.

A survey of 30 respondents reveal that their brand loyalty is significantly influenced by their engagement to the elements of moral responsibility and shared rituals and traditions but weakly influenced by the first element, that is consciousness of a kind.
