Abstrak

The focus of the study is spiritual experience of women with cervical cancer. A phenomenological qualitative study was used to examine a comprehensive understanding on this particular behaviour and how they interpret those experiences. The research revealed a fact that women with cervical cancer had spiritual experiences as they felt uncertainties and suffers in their whole life but still motivated, the belief in God brings their hopes and made their life brighter. The result of this research has an implication into nursing service so that the holistic nursing process implementation to cervical cancer clients could improved.
