Abstrak

the research incorporates a generational study with an emphasis on the opinions, attitudes and beliefs of the female respondents themselves, which are compared and contrasted with those of their mothers. In essence the research explores the impacts of industrialization on the culturally grounded status of women in West Java and around Bonjoran in 1996/97. Status of women is analyzed in terms of decision making power in the household, control of income, control of young women's human resource (factory labour) and within the realm of gender relation in Banjarun, both in the household and the village. The 'social' and economic' impacts and outcomes of industrial development upon cultural values, attitudes and traditional employment of women are important to the demographic impacts apparent in the findings of this paper.
