The number of pregnant women and giving birth who are suffering from HIV from year to year tends to increase in the world and Indonesia. This research was a phenomenological qualitative study which explored the experiences of mother who has been diagnosed HIV about family's support during labor. Eight participants were selected based on purposive sampling. Data were collected by in-depth interview technique, and were analysed by tematic analysis. Most of participants obtained emosional, spiritual, financial support and relevan information from their family. On the other hand, a few of participants did not receive support from their family. This study found that family's support for mothers during their pregnant and giving birth would emerging happiness and feel calm. Some participants obtained a negative responses as a consequence of stigma from their family and health care providers. Maternity nurse has a role for applying nursing care by involving family to provide direct care by giving psychological, social, and spiritual support for mothers during labor.
