This thesis used qualitative approach and study case as research design, while data ore colected through in depth interview, observation, participative observation and study of document.

This research found that patrol activities was not managed well. Such finding was indicated by unoptimized execution of all management functions: plauning, organizing, actuating and controlling. Another finding is that patrol activities were unable to prevent crime, as there is no strong corelation between the decreasing nunlber of crimes and differenziation of patrol activities. This researeh also reveals that community policing through patrol activities is not optimal particularly generated by the low level of communication between patrol officers and the community.

Based on those findings, the author would like to suggest Jatiuwung Sector Police Command: to conduct foot patrol as well as bike patrol, to increase patrol officers' capacity hy conducting such training, to change the approach and perception on patrol activities, and to improve the control mechanism of patrol activities.
