This thesis discusses the competitiveness of local wisdom-based marine tourism destinations in the Sangihe Islands Regency through an analysis of destination competitiveness and place marketing. Destination competitiveness was used to assess the marine-tourism destination competitiveness in the context of developing the strategies that were carried out through place marketing theory. This research is a descriptive qualitative study with a post-positivism approach.

The findings showed that the marine tourism destinations in the Sangihe Islands Regency were competitive based on indicators of natural resources, heritage and culture, and special events and were not competitive on the indicators of tourism infrastructure, demand conditions, promotion and coordination.

This research recommends the local government of Sangihe Islands Regency and tourism stakeholders, to integrate marine tourism with local wisdom through buying products and buying experience, segmenting potential tourists, carrying out national and international-level tourism events by highlighting elements of local wisdom, implementing Community- Based Tourism and Public-Private Partnership and collaborating with tourism observer groups in promoting local wisdom-based marine tourism and addressing the environmental issues of Sangihe marine tourism, shaping a brand image of marine tourism destinations and targeting potential tourists markets based on tourist destination activities, demographics and tourist visits
