ABSTRACT

This study discusses the influence of perceived brand value on brand loyalty mediated by brand trust and brand affect on two brand categories which are sustainable brand and conventional brand. This study also discusses the moderating effect of sustainability knowledge and fashion consciousness on the relationship between perceived brand value on brand trust and brand affect. The data was collected through online questionnaire with the sample of 232 respondents. The result shows that there is a positive influence of perceived brand value on brand trust and brand affect on both brand categories. Brand trust and brand affect have positive influence on brand loyalty on both brand categories. Sustainability knowledge as a moderating variable does not enhance the relationship between perceived brand value on brand trust and brand affect for sustainable brand category. Fashion consciousness as a moderating variable also does not enhance the relationship between perceived brand value on brand trust and brand affect for conventional brand category.
