.....Affective organizational commitment became one of the challenges that leaders in public sector organizations had to face. Research indicated the existence of personal and situational factors that could shape affective organizational commitment. This study aimed to examine the relationship between leader communication style through six dimensions, namely expressiveness, accuracy, verbal aggression, curiosity, emotionality, and manipulative impression, with affective organizational commitment and the quality of leader-member interpersonal relationships (LMX). Additionally, it explored how LMX mediated the relationship between leader communication style and affective organizational commitment in public sector organizations. The results of this study showed that the leader's communication style in the expressive dimension was significantly positively related to affective organizational commitment. The communication style in the expressive and accuracy dimensions was significantly positively related to LMX, while verbal aggression was significantly negatively related to LMX.
