..... This study aims to explain the representation of marginalization and social criticism contained in Hirokazu Kore-eda's Manbiki Kazoku. Primary data was obtained from the movie Manbiki Kazoku using documentation technique. Scenes that are considered to contain representations of marginalization are noted and selected as primary data sources. Secondary data sources were obtained through the literature study method using articles, books, journals, and other scientific works. The theory used is the theory of representation according to Stuart Hall and the data is analyzed through semiotic theory according to Roland Barthes. This study found that in the film Manbiki Kazoku, marginalization is represented through the lives and experiences of each member of the Shibata Family. Their socio-economic condition is reflected in their appearance and daily life, which forces them to shoplift as a survival strategy, highlighting that marginalized individuals are often forced to take illicit means to survive. Their employment challenges as part-time workers and sex workers demonstrate their vulnerability to exploitation and stigmatization. Shota and Yuri's experiences, which includes neglect, abuse, and educational limitations, as well as Hatsue's isolation, also reflect marginalization.
