.....This study compares the rules related to the rights of child alimony rights in two countries, Indonesia and South Korea, by comparing the rules in both countries, namely the Marriage Law in Indonesia and the Act of Enforcing and Supporting Child Support Payment in South Korea. Doctrinal research will be carried out with a descriptive typology so that information and explanations will be obtained, especially about the arrangements related to the alimony rights of children after divorce in Indonesia based on the Marriage Law, child support arrangements in South Korea based on the Act of Enforcing and Supporting Child Support Payment, and the comparison between the two regulations. The results of the study show that in Indonesia, the regulation regarding the rights of child alimony rights has not been comprehensively regulated, in contrast to South Korea, which already has a comprehensive written regulation related to the rights of child alimony after divorce. Based on the lack of regulations in Indonesia, it affects the accuracy of the Panel of Judges in giving a verdict. Thus, regulations in Indonesia can be clarified for the sake of legal certainty, with South Korean regulations can be a reference.
